

Comments below appeared on an article published by Lee Hecht Harrison SVP Michael Schumacher behind the firewall of the LHH LinkedIn Group. A screen shot is here:

<http://corcodilos.com/files/leehechtharrisonrip-off.pdf>

Only clients and alumni of LHH's paid services can access it on LinkedIn.

The article being commented on is a rip-off of a copyright-protected Ask The Headhunter article written and published over ten years ago: There is no sure thing

Many thanks to the Lee Hecht Harrison clients who busted Schumacher and showed me his "work." LHH's clients are enjoying stolen content.

The question is, why are they paying Lee Hecht Harrison for it?

- |   |   |
|---|---|
|    | Don ChamplinAnd I would add do not be too quick to accept an offer without having researched company, culture and boss, gotten answers to your questions and taken time to discuss the offer with your family, mentor and/or your career coach. :) Definitely never break connections completely because connections should be give - give not just ask - receive.3 months ago |
|   | Guy MilletVery good points. I unfortunately had to cancel an offer letter because of corporate changes, and could do nothing about it, just feel sorry for my ex-future-hire.3 months ago  |
|  | Robin Rust"There is never a sure thing." That is for sure!!!!!!3 months ago  |
|  | Donna BowersGood advice.2 months ago   |
|  | Matt SchweyerI couldn't agree more! Sound advice.2 months ago  |
|  | Allen CarpenterOh god i lived this nightmare this past month.. So true2 months ago   |
|  | Donna DemarestVery good points. I would always keep any contacts i have made in business, you never know when you might want to reach out to someone, for business purposes or simply to say hello, and not be forgotten..2 months ago   |